One of the earliest references to the Order of the Blood appears in the "Chronica Hungarorum," a 14th-century Hungarian chronicle. However, he eventually turned against the Templars and founded his own secret organization, the Order of the Blood, which was dedicated to fighting against the Mongols and other enemies of Christendom.

Another legend connects the Order of the Blood to the House of Anjou, a royal dynasty that ruled in Naples, Hungary, and Poland during the 14th and 15th centuries. It is said that King Louis I of Hungary, a member of the Anjou dynasty, established the Order of the Blood as an elite order of chivalry. The members of the order were sworn to defend the kingdom and its ruler against internal and external threats.
